About Women--By A Mere Man

I have often thought I would like to try the experiment of loving the same woman twice--but I have never dared to give up the time to do it.

I spent yesterday with the cleverest girl in the world. It has taken me all the time since then to recover from the conviction of my own importance.

The length of time it takes to get around a girl's waist is not always in proportion to its size.

The woman who stands in front of her door and looks up and down the street is not always looking for her husband.

I never stood well in chemistry. That is why I derive no enjoyment from making up of a made up woman.

It would be impossible for me to respect any woman who did not have the capacity to make me suffer.

To a sick man, every trained nurse under forty is a thing of beauty and a joy forever.

It has been said that women never provide for the future. To this Eve stands as a permanent contradiction.

Every woman resents in her heart the man who respects her for character alone.

You can always tell that moment when girlhood has departed and womanhood has begun. It is at this point that she never has anything to wear.

When, without consulting a woman, a man can order a dinner at a restaurant with which she is perfectly satisfied, he has arrived at the fullness of his power; there is nothing more for him to achieve.

It is a wise woman who knows when to resent unfamiliarity.

No woman ever acquired virtue or had it thrust upon her.

The unconventional woman needs no chaperon. --August Smart Set
